Alternative Pasts, Presents, and Futures in Star Trek: Historical Engagement and Representation through Popular Culture

ABSTRACT

Star Trek has long used its unique situation as a socially and politically engaged television show to approach contemporary, historical, and futuristic ideas of race, labor, gender, nature, landscape, and place. The concept of alternate perceptions of history continues to provide engaging insights into historical representation. This paper explores how Star Trek, as an example of performance, media, and popular culture, contributes to dialogues of alternate pasts, presents, and futures. It builds upon these concepts to engage with and influence geographical dialogues of public space, nature, geopolitics, and societal structure. I explore examples from the television show and the wider universe, particularly two episodes from Star Trek: Deep Space Nine that are both influenced by historical figures and events and, through time travel, reveal their own historical narratives. While Star Trek continues to operate in fictional space, constructing an 'idealized' future and imagined landscapes, this paper recognizes that its influence shapes an experienced and an embodied sense of alternate past, present, and future.

Key Words: Star Trek; popular culture; history; imagined landscapes; futures

GEOGRAPHIES, FUTURES, AND STAR TREK

Star Trek first aired in 1966, followed by thirty seasons across six different series, with the newest premiering in January 2017. The various television shows, thirteen feature films, well over one hundred works of literature, and numerous expressions of fandom through conventions and exhibitions have found their way into the very fabric of our society, influencing even NASA's first named space shuttle: Enterprise. Star Trek's place both within and beyond popular culture has enabled it to engage with critical social and political issues. This engagement is enhanced

How do you cite a source that you found in another source?

Try as much as possible to avoid using secondary sources, because of the risk of alteration to the original text. If there is no other alternative please discuss it with your supervisor first. In the body of the text specify the primary source and refer to the secondary source. In the bibliography you only refer to the secondary source. In APA6 In...
